I. Presentation

The Regional Group on Financing and Infrastructure (GREFI) made up of the Environment and Society Association (AAS); Law, Environment and Natural Resources (DAR) and the Foundation for the Development of Sustainable Policies (Fundeps), in November 2021, held a workshop called: "Follow-up of relations between China and Latin America: exchange of experiences". This space brought together different civil society organizations (CSOs), academia, indigenous leaders and journalists from the region who follow the relationship between China and Latin America, or have been impacted by the investments of the Asian country.

The objective of the space was to identify common issues and key elements of discussion, based on the work and experience of monitoring and advocacy of communities, civil society organizations, academia and journalists, regarding relations between China and Latin America, which serves to promote greater articulation between the actors, identify the differences, limitations and opportunities for joint work.

The organizations that make up GREFI appreciate the participation of all the institutions that collaborated and participated, especially the exhibitors. At the same time, we hope to continue articulating spaces and actions that allow progress in strengthening scenarios of environmental justice and protection of human rights, in the face of the different investments and projects that are implemented in our region.

II. Objectives of the Workshop

The general objective was to identify common issues and key elements of discussion, based on the work and experience of monitoring and advocacy of communities, civil society organizations, academia and journalists, regarding relations between China and Latin America, to promote greater articulation between the actors.

The specific objectives were:

- Exchange experiences from civil society, journalism and academia, on the monitoring of Chinese investment relations with the countries of the region.
- Identify differences, limitations and opportunities for joint work.
- Generate links between the participants that allow a greater articulation in their respective fields of work.

III. Strong ideas of the participants

- It is not enough to include financing with, supposedly, clean or sustainable energy in a logic of socio-environmental progress, but one parameter must be the protection of human rights so as not to negatively affect indigenous peoples with these projects.
- Extraterritorial rights (especially in the framework of the UPR) are one of the few tools with which it can be claimed that China has direct responsibility for the negative impacts of its operations outside its territory in environmental and rights issues. humans. Therefore, joint work on monitoring compliance with China's recommendations and obligations for the 2023 UPR must continue.
- The UN recommendations on environmental matters and territorial responsibility for China have increased gradually with each review, which has been important given that it is not a country that deals with NGOs or local communities. The increase may mainly be due to shadow reports provided to the Human Rights Council.
- China is not advancing in a dialogue on environmental issues and human rights, nor in dialogue with those who present complaints about the performance of their companies or banks. If a space for dialogue is not achieved, it is difficult to generate progress on advocacy in Chinese institutions.

- From the experiences of the indigenous peoples, the idea of applying their own rights and social control has arisen when they feel that the State turns its back on them and sides with the transnational corporations.
- It is not possible to think about development or financing or investment without thinking about human rights as a parameter. This must be thought of together with effective participation and consultation mechanisms and prior, free and informed consent, because it is fundamental.
- We can think of three ideas: participation, permanence before, during and after the projects for more transparency, and responsibility to think about development respecting human rights.
- There is a greater number of declarations and guidelines that are emerging in China, which are beginning to speak, for example, of the need for information to be public, of having spaces for dialogue with local organizations and with communities that even speak of query best practices. They are emerging, although they are not completely new, but even some of these guidelines or these guidelines have a consultation process within China, although it is not a quality process.
- A greater space can be found to relate to political parties when talking about corruption issues. In part it may be because it is a political issue. Several of the contracts that have been signed with Chinese companies and the loan contracts have many problems.
- There is an intense relationship between academia and other sectors such as Chinese, American and Latin American journalism in general. There is an intense relationship with actors interested in an open and heterogeneous debate.
- There is a very important diversification of infrastructure projects by country, by sector, increasingly sustainable and green, with all its complications, and by the ownership of the Chinese company. Private companies start slowly.
- As a civil society, we have the responsibility to understand China from its own reality, to understand it as a complex actor with sectors and interests. In addition, civil society must act as a bridge between social actors and with future generations of researchers.
- Describing China by integrating Chinese perspectives and information that they believe to be of Chinese origin and language, translating and contextualizing it, can often help to encourage greater transparency and accountability from the actors and institutions we cover, which is always the trade of journalism, and which often forms an integral part of civil society campaigns.
- The explicit goal of the Chinese media is to support the foreign policy goals of its government. Many times, it is difficult to access impartial and independent information, because what is read in Chinese media and even those in Spanish, which publish in Portuguese or Spanish, comes from another journalistic tradition and has a quite different organization.
- The journalism that we do (Mongabay) in the reports that have had to do with Chinese investments, our role has been to investigate, reveal and show what is happening in the field, what is happening in the places where these are investments.
- The relationship with the Chinese public sector and, particularly, with Chinese academic counterparts, is particularly difficult.
- In the academy we have the luxury of looking at how Chinese companies learn, how their Latin American counterparts also learn, in the public sector, at the municipal, provincial, state, federal, etc. levels.
- It is necessary to understand and demystify how the public sector works and Chinese companies that are in a process of evolution and learning.
- It is mentioned that all governments, in one way or another, seek to be opaque. Including not only them but also the companies, because if they could be opaque, they would be.
- In Latin America we live in a time of great innocence with respect to China, because there is no information and many of the issues, they discuss are very optimistic.

- There should be an independent way of seeing China, either through the media or civil society through the academy, that impartial information is transmitted and that when this information is not biased, it comes from think tanks that they are financed by some organization linked to China, so let it be known as well.
- Western journalism models and the Chinese tradition sometimes conflict.

IV. Main challenges identified

The participants agreed on different challenges that we face as civil society, journalism and academia. Here is a summary:

- Continue and strengthen the incidence and requests for oversight mechanisms, transparency, access to information as essential safeguards to improve the relationship between investments, projects of China with the communities, civil society in general in the region.
- It is a priority to work to achieve formal dialogue spaces and complaint mechanisms at the local level with Chinese actors, so that we also demonstrate to local communities that all efforts have a short-term result.
- Our priority is to ensure the protection of human rights and territories. If there are very clear urgencies of the local communities that are experiencing the impacts of many Chinese or non-Chinese investment projects.
- Monitor and report cases of rights violations, within the necessary protection measures, which in some contexts have even had the support of States, far-right factions, paramilitaries, among others.
- Maintain spaces for the exchange and dissemination of information on cases where human rights violations have occurred, together with those affected, taking into account measures to make them safe spaces.
- Maintain research and analysis of projects and investments, with emphasis on those promoted as part of the energy transition, which are currently presented in a logic of socio-environmental progress, but are showing that they do not have parameters for the protection of human rights.
- Maintain and strengthen the review and development of independent socio-environmental studies to demonstrate shortcomings or improve studies proposed by companies and governments.
- Know how our governments work, in particular on the relationship with China and how we would like them to work; in a way that opens up the possibility of dealing with China in a way that is beneficial to us
- Educate those who have the possibility of collaborating with us, there are few foundations that are willing to take the risk of working on these issues, because it is very difficult to obtain results in the short term. Therefore, we must demonstrate that the work we do has an impact.
- Put new topics, concepts and perspectives on the agenda. China must be put on the agenda, like the new concept of development, the construction of an ecological civilization, the concept of dual circulation.
- We have the responsibility to understand China as a complex actor. China is not one, it is not a monolith, integrating Chinese perspectives, information and contexts.
- A challenge for the academy is to allow a dialogue and specify topics, in a critical, friendly way, with specific debates, for example, on the global soybean chain in Argentina, Uruguay and Brazil.
- Maintain and strengthen the link between civil society and journalism in Latin America, as they are an important source of information and research and to connect civil society with information on China; as well as receiving comments to improve the work and show a realistic image of what is happening on the ground.

- Act as a bridge, connecting Latin American and Chinese audiences with information and perspectives on China that may not be accessible for reasons of language or not being able to translate well and contextualize important Chinese policies.
- Make visible and disseminate all the important work that has already been done.
- Begin to learn about experiences from other regions. Perhaps they are going through or have gone through similar processes or are going through very similar interests to ours, trying to articulate, particularly in Asia and Africa.

V. Recommendations

Among the main recommendations and reflections for the future that emerged throughout the event, the following aspects can be highlighted:

- The need to connect and learn about experiences from other regions: one of the strategic points is not only to connect between the organizations in the region, but also to begin to learn about the experiences of organizations and actors from other regions, from whom many experiences can perhaps be drawn rich, positive and negative. That is an alternative and it is a possible field of action to work on.
- There is still a long way to go in this process to articulate from the region, from Latin America, but also by listening to other voices and other regions (despite the fact that they are different realities and that it is necessary to know how to differentiate it), valuable experiences, lessons and learned lessons; and draw some conclusions that can be replicated to the situation in Latin America.
- The last thing civil society has to lose is hope. It is important to recognize that what we are doing and what is being achieved from civil society is not bad or little. We have to realize the progress we have made and continue on the path of making more efforts, of continuing to improve, to continue meeting, to continue thinking about projects and to continue seeking financing. We can be creative, but we don't necessarily have to start from scratch.
- From each of our areas: civil society, academia, press, etc., we must make China not a fashionable topic, but a topic that must be constantly on the agenda, on which we must become experts to have a continuous conversation. As things happen, people become experts and then stop doing it. It would be very valuable to know that there are people who are dedicated to this, to get to know them and truly create a network that allows constant dialogue.
- It is important to emphasize institutions, not so much people. We require specialized institutions that allow a concrete dialogue on the subject.
- There are moments of strategic action that we should or perhaps could take advantage of together, perhaps as countries or as a region. There are key moments where one can approach China, especially in terms of advocacy on human rights, such as the Universal Periodic Review. Continuing with spaces like these could be a strategy. That cases be made visible, accompanied by journalism and the academy, where reliable data is noted.
- The issue of financing for civil society organizations is an important issue, but also for other actors. This is an important factor to work on in the future. How can we achieve more openness among the actors to finance research and advocacy on this agenda? It is important that civil society organizations in the region reflect a certain coherence in the work articulated on the subject. Not all should have the same work perspective, the same objectives, but they should reflect that the different actors dialogue with each other, exchange information, are all more or less in the same line of knowledge and work on the subject.
- It is really very difficult to become a specialist in each of the actors involved in financing for development. For this reason, it is also important, beyond knowing the different actors, to emphasize cross-cutting issues. We are interested in these actors having transparency in their actions, providing information on the products, and complying with certain environmental and social regulations. In this sense, it is important to focus more on our governments, because with China there is the peculiarity that national governments have a great relationship that, perhaps, did not exist with other actors at the level of financing for development in past decades. There is also a lot of work to do in this regard, in knowing how our government works, particularly in its relationship with China and how we want it to do so.

- Beyond the particular work in relation to the agenda, I feel that we should not lose sight of the very clear urgencies of the people, of the local communities that are experiencing the impacts of many investment projects, both Chinese and from other origins. Dialogue with national institutions, which are also responsible for many of these tasks and responsibilities for the protection of human rights and communities, will always be a challenge.
